Highbanks, Like a Child Asleep in Its Own Life

The small creek that drifts down to the river in slow numberless curves is buried in leaves.

Branches and trunks stand like streams feeding the sky into the ground. The banks are gone under a sleep that covers the world, hills, rocks, fallen trees, like a second ground over the ground. But in the blurred bed, fragments of open water glisten, and there, bending close as a jeweller over his work, you see the surface trembles with a secret current running under the leaves like the shape of your life eluding you forever.

Return of the Repressed at Hoover Reservoir

He weighted the bag with two car wheels and slept. but four months later she came up. Some boys fooling in a boat found her bobbing slowly through copper-colored water. silver back just breaking the surface like a large jellyfish. From the teeth, those tough parts that last two million years, they pieced the unrecognizable together and found a car missing two wheels, rusting deep in weeds behind his house. Suddenly, as if matter itself had turned against him, after all those centuries, his life was over.