Prairie Voices

I live and die in the rhythm of the earth. In life, the song of the bugs entertains me and the rain sustains me As the seasons come and go.

I live to give seed To the indolent reed And the soil that girded me. It has always been so.

Why do you give birth?
Is it your purpose to seed the eager earth?
Where do you go?
The oak tree wants to know.

I was born to give life; I die to be reborn I sow the soil to soothe my soul, The ground is where I go.

The gurgling brook wets withered roots And the water brings life And the bugs' song survives And the cycle of life is revived.

Brenda Ackerman